

Mindset Challenge:

Active and Avoidant Coping

EXPLORE

Circle the activities you engage in to cope. Write in your own if not listed.

Active		Avoidant
	Talk about what is going on	4	Sleeping
(2)	Relax with a massage or rest		Isolating
(B)	Eat a healthy meal		Using screens: TV, phone, internet
(B)	Listen to music		Taking a time out
(B)	Go outside for a walk in nature		Leaving an argument
(B)	Being assertive with someone		Denying or repressing feelings
(4)	Share feelings and be vulnerable	4	Procrastinating
(4)	Do physical activity or work out	4	Playing video games or escaping into
	Meditate or pray		fantasy
	Take slow, relaxing, deep breaths		Eating to escape feelings
	Create: journal, draw, or paint		Trying to avoid negative feelings with
	Ask for help from family or friends		alcohol or drugs
	Vent or debrief feelings	(1)	Punishing or withholding from oneself
(B)	Go to a support group		Shopping or buying to distract oneself
(B)	See a counselor		Shutting down physically or emotionally
(B)	Collect more information		Distracting with tasks or work
(4)	Brainstorm for solutions		Being passive
	Investigate future options		Ruminating in anger or resentment
(B)	Set goals or let old ones go		Refusing to ask for help
(B)	Reflect and focus on your strengths		Denying a problem exists
(B)	Learn a new skill		Trying to change how you feel by using
(B)	Help someone else or volunteer		substances, shopping, or working
(4)

DISCUSS

What are the pros and cons of active coping? What are the pros and cons of avoidant coping? Do you have more active or more avoidant coping circled?

CHALLENGE

Do you have a negative mindset about avoidant coping? Although true that your active coping skills may suffer if too much avoidance coping occurs, especially if negative or even destructive methods are used. Some avoidant coping can be positive. Rethink your mindset regarding how you view active vs. avoidant coping. Decide what percentage of active and avoidant coping are right for you.